Definition and Examples of a Pathological Liar

By Robert Longley

October 28, 2019

A pathological liar is an individual who chronically tells grandiose lies that may stretch or exceed the limits of believability.

While most people lie or at least bend the truth occasionally, pathological liars do so habitually.

Whether or not pathological lying should be considered a distinct psychological disorder is still debated within the medical and academic communities.

Key Takeaways

Pathological liars habitually lie in order to gain attention or sympathy.

The lies told by pathological liars are typically grandiose or fantastic in scope.

Pathological liars are always the heroes, heroines, or victims of the stories they concoct.

Liar vs. liar

The verb lie has two sets of definitions.

First, it refers to someone or something that reclines, rests in a horizontal position, or is situated in a specified place. Someone or something that does one of these things is a liar.

A liar on the floor, for instance, risks getting stepped on. *

The second main definition of lie is to make a statement one knows to be false. One who does this is a liar.
